KIRKUS REVIEW. The boy and his parents put Mousie in a box with some of his favorite things—carrots, a piece of jam toast, and a toy or two—and make a headstone for him out of driftwood. Readers can hear the boy working things out for himself, that Mousie won't ever come back, that grief and longing are what he feels.

GOODBYE MOUSIE. After his first outpouring of grief and anger (which Ormerod depicts in a stunning facial close-up), the boy focuses on preparations for Mousie's funeral, busily filling the coffin with mentos and then decorating it with "wiggly stripes.". But his composure crumbles when he discovers a piece of toast missing from his plate: "Where...
