EFF - JONAH FITZGERALD

The discipline of clinical medicine and the natural and supernatural obsessions of Romantic literature emerged out of the same cultural configurations. Janis Caldwell investigates the links between the growing scientific materialism of the nineteenth century and the persistence of the Romantic literary imagination.

Rothfield works with French as well as British texts, and extends his study to later in the nineteenth century, which might explain why he sees medicine as a powerful profession that generated literary emulation. 19 But this Foucauldian argument for the disciplinary power of medicine cannot account particularly well for the interactions between literature and medicine early in nineteenth ...
