Finlaggan Eilean Mor - The Lords of the Isles

The 2nd Lord of the Isles, Donald of Islay had been succeeded by the 3rd Lord of the Isles, his son Alexander of Islay in 1423. By 1426 Alexander was laying claim to the Earldom of Ross (by now a royal possession), and James I responded by imprisoning Alexander, Alexander's mother and many of his followers.

The Lord of Isles alludes to a unique parcel of medieval history – with the title belonging to a particular branch of the Scottish nobility who claimed descendance from both Gaelic and Viking (Nordic) forebearers. Over the course of the proverbial Middle Ages, these Lords of the Isles commanded a strong fleet of birlinns (galleys) and were counted as autonomous vassals of the Kings of Norway ...

The full title of this book is THE LORDS OF THE ISLES: THE CLAN DONALD AND THE EARLY KINGDOM OF THE SCOTS. At first glance, it is far more than its title indicates. It covers a thousand years of history in the Hebrides and the adjoining parts of Western Scotland, first under the Celtic Kingdom of Dalriada beginning around 500 AD; secondly under ...

The ruling MacDonald Lords commanded a strong semi-independent maritime kingdom from their powerbase at Finlaggan. When the MacDonald Lords were at home or there was a Council session or ceremonial occasion Finlaggan was the crossroad of the Isles.

Finlaggan was the home of the MacDonald chiefs for almost four hundred years, from the 12th to the 16th century. From Finlaggan, the Lord of the Isles ruled the Western part of Scotland from Kintyre to Lewis. They gained control from their Norse overlords, adopted their maritime skills and improved on them.
